Nothing Happened on Thursday, and It Was Recorded Carefully

One issue after the beginning, the site holds its breath, and its owner, a self-described Problem Solver, appears to have found no problem worth touching today.

The second issue of CC News arrives to report what amounts to a held breath. In the twenty-four hours ending this Thursday, the last week of October 2026, theqiyas.cc changed by exactly nothing. No pages were added. No lines were struck out. The commit log, if it keeps a diary, wrote the date and then put the pen down.

The previous front page announced that Qiyas had started. Starting, it turns out, is a single event, and what follows it is mostly waiting. Beginnings are loud and continuations are quiet, and this paper has now covered both.

The owner’s mood field is blank, and so is the note beside it. This publication declines to read too much into an empty box. It may mean contentment, or fatigue, or simply a day spent elsewhere, among people and objects that do not render in a browser. A blank is not a confession. It is only a blank.

Qiyas calls himself a Problem Solver. It is worth noting that a solver at rest is not a failure of the title. Some days the problems are offline. Some days the most precise solution is to leave the thing alone and let it sit in the late autumn light, unrefactored.

The site, meanwhile, remains where it was left: up, reachable, patient. It asks for nothing. It will be there tomorrow, slightly older and exactly the same, which is more than most of us can promise.
