Episode 74 Plays While Six Projects Rise From the Archive Like Men From a Long Ambush

On a Sunday given over to Kurtlar Vadisi, the site quietly populated itself with a lifetime of work, filed in the order it was remembered.

Sunday, the eighth of November. The status line reports, without ornament, that Qiyas is watching Kurtlar Vadisi Pusu, episode 74. Yesterday it was Gladio. The day before, presumably, episode 73. The valley is long, and the walk through it is being taken one hour at a time. The note field is empty. Some days do not require captions.

But the empty note conceals a busy table. In the last twenty-four hours, twenty-four entries were written into the ledger, eighteen of them births. Six projects were started and, within the same breath, updated: TikTok Games, Estate Listing Pusher, Obadan (LaFood), Cheesy Pizzy, Autoreply, and CC Journal. None of them is new in the way a morning is new. They are older work, finally given addresses. A man taking inventory of what he has built, between episodes.

The technologies arrived alongside them like witnesses called to testify: FastAPI, TikTokLive, three.js, SQLite, SQLAlchemy, Django REST Framework, Kotlin, Android, Node.js, Fastify. Ten names, ten small tools, each one a remembered afternoon of documentation and stubbornness. Taken together they sketch the outline of someone who solves problems in whatever language the problem happens to speak.

There is a pleasing symmetry in a pizza shop sharing a register with a live-stream game engine and a machine that pushes estate listings into the world. Nothing in the record explains the order. The archive was not written chronologically; it was written the way memory surfaces, one name pulling the next behind it.

And last in the filing, or perhaps first, CC Journal: a project about this place, entered into this place. The newspaper notes it without comment, the way one notes a mirror placed across from another mirror.

Issue № 12 closes here. Somewhere, episode 74 is still running. Somewhere, a database is slightly fuller than it was yesterday. Both are forms of keeping watch.
