Saturday Arrives at 00:08 and Finds Qiyas Already at Work, Thirty-Two Commits Deep by the Time the Sky Turns Grey

Fifteen repositories, eleven sets of documentation, half a store and one legend about the Taj Mahal, all written in the hours most of Baku reserves for sleeping.

The first commit landed at 00:08, which means Saturday never had a chance. By 00:36 GNET had been rebuilt in six movements: Lucide icons drawn over every old one, a gallery and an info column finally persuaded to share a bottom edge, and a blue tick handed to every store. The tick is a small mark of recognition. Its author, at that hour, received none.

At 01:17 came a quieter thing. A single commit to cc-edit taught stock footage to look like ink drawings, ordinary clips rendered as if someone had sketched them by hand. Between 02:35 and 03:10 there was a different tempo entirely: seven commits to Oyun Qurdu, bringing automatic pricing, a newsroom, SEO and a shield against attack. Half a store in thirty-five minutes. In the middle of it, at 02:58, he paused to add PyPI badges to the Hostinger and Namecheap SDKs, then published django-sightline 0.2.0 at 03:00 sharp.

The status log, meanwhile, kept rewriting itself. Nine entries were deleted and reborn under slightly different titles: “rebuilds sleep” became “the rest of Baku sleeps”, “a whole store roadmap” became “half a store”. The site seems to be revising its own diary in real time, the way a person does who has been awake too long.

Between 04:34 and 05:12 the work turned to explanation. Read the Docs pages went up for eleven repositories, covering Epoint, FazerCards, lalafo, tap.az, bina.az, GoDaddy and DigitalOcean among them. The Epoint SDK received its documentation in three languages. Documentation of this kind tends to be written by people who expect to forget, or who expect not to be there to explain it themselves.

At 05:07 he wrote the Taj Mahal legend onto his hire page. At 05:09 he cut it to a single paragraph with the names removed. In the story an emperor builds something beautiful and afterward cannot let anyone build it again. Two minutes was all the editing took, and nobody has yet suggested sleep.
